

Do you want to be part of a new research project about how children's well-being and participation develops over time?

Who? Children with disabilities born 2007–2009 and 2013–2015 and their families.

What? A research project in which children and their parents answer questions about well-being and participation once a year for four years. The study is a collaboration between several universities, colleges and regions in the country.

Why? There is a lack of knowledge about the well-being of children with disabilities and their participation in various activities. Increased knowledge of well-being and participation is important to be able to develop new and effective support efforts.

How? Researchers meet and interview the children. The questions and approach are adapted so that as many children as possible can join in – regardless of disability. Parents can give their answers in an online questionnaire.

You can watch an informational video which describes the study, click on the link or scan the QR code below with your smartphone's camera to get to the video.
